HAS IT BEEN COLD THIS WINTER?

Climatologists define winter as lasting from December to February. This winter can be compared with previous ones using the Central England Temperature series (CET). This is the longest composite temperature series in the world – it provides assessments of the average temperature for each month from January 1659, just a few years after thermometers were invented. The CET is a temperature calculated from a few available weather stations from NW England to Oxfordshire, so broadly representative of central England and compares well with temperatures in the regions of England and Wales.

Rank since 1950	Winter	Mean CET °C
1	1962/63	-0.3	The coldest winter in the entire 360-year series
2	1978/79	+1.6	Lengthy cold winter followed by a cold spring
3	1981/82	+2.6	Very cold and snowy until mid-January, then mild
4	1984/85	+2.7	Cold in Jan. and Feb.
=5	1950/51	+2.9	Lengthy, snowy winter
=5	1955/56	+2.9	Intensely cold in February
=5	1985/86	+2.9	Very cold, but dry, in February
8	1990/91	+3.0	Average December, cold in January and February
9	1995/96	+3.0	Very cold in December and February
10	2008/09	+3.1	Cold in each month
11	1968/69	+3.2
=12	1969/70	+3.3
=12	1976/77	+3.3

The coldest winters since 1950

The current winter is notable for having been persistently cold, unlike several of the coldest shown in the table. The cold spells this winter have not been exceptionally cold nationally, but cold enough for significant snowfall. It has been colder than most winters in the early 20^{th} century. N.B. The cold winter of 1947 had an average figure of +1.1°C.
